Detroit trod a surefire path to economic ruin

Locals left in the dark on plans for elevated ‘roof car’

As a state project with an impact on the life of locals, construction of an elevated highway across parts of a major city landmark — a matter of conjecture, but history, all the same — has not been done without opposition or scrutiny. But can we guarantee that the elites will listen to their problems and respect the people’s will, and that the horrific violence committed by the separatists will end? Perhaps not, but the voices of ordinary people must be heard. The wrongs that have been done must be righted.

We should all be wary of Larry Summers’ arrogance
