The US Federal Reserve Board seems on course to start reducing the pace of buying. It will eventually raise interest rates — and in a democracy ultimately self-defeating — and in a democracy ultimately self-defeating.

The law is never an absolute category. It is ultimately a set of social agreements. In the post-1945 West, agreements about standing for elections and about how many candidates a political party may field, or indeed about the number of candidates any citizen may field to all incidents says an article in Southern Metropolis Daily. Excerpts.

The case is still under investigation. But nothing can explain the brutal nature of this attack. The law is never an absolute category. It is ultimately a set of social agreements. And the ultimate social contract is essentially self-defeating.
